A LITTLE ABOUT THE FILMMAKER

The person behind the camera.

Over the past six years, filmmaking has grown into something much greater than a passion. I'm constantly searching for ways to create meaningful works of art, exploring new ideas, emotions, and perspectives through the films I make. While attending Messiah University and pursuing a degree in Film and Media Arts, I developed a deeper appreciation for documentary filmmaking and the power of capturing genuine human emotion. I began to understand that the most meaningful moments aren't always the ones that are planned. They're the ones that simply happen. Those lessons fundamentally shaped the way I approach wedding filmmaking today. In an industry often defined by slow motion and familiar formulas, I've found myself drawn to something different. I want my films to feel honest, intentional, and timeless. Finding a style of my own has become one of the things I love most about this craft. A wedding brings together something truly special; the people, the stories, the relationships, and the emotions that make two lives so meaningful to one another. It creates a beautiful foundation for a film that goes beyond simply documenting a day. Because to me, filmmaking has never been just about making something beautiful. It's about creating something that matters. And being trusted to preserve moments that people will carry with them for the rest of their lives is something I will never take for granted.

Not everything needs to be perfect.

The nostalgic VHS camera brings another texture to the story — spontaneous, imperfect, and full of personality. A different perspective on the people and moments that make the day yours.

A moment,
just for the two of you.

The pre-wedding couples shoot is a chance to step away from the wedding day rush and focus on the connection you share. It creates space for natural moments, quiet gestures, and a little time together before the celebration begins.
